

[Preprint, version 2007]

[D.Berti & G.Tarabout (eds.), Territory, Soil and Society in South Asia, Delhi, Manohar -expected 2008]

Introduction

DANIELA BERTI and GILLES TARABOUT

This volume has been prepared with a view to confront a widespread stereotype in academic studies about India. According to this stereotype, pre-colonial India consisted of territorial units with ill-defined, fuzzy boundaries. This is taken to be a specifically Indian characteristic as the very notion of territory in Indian civilization is said to be of secondary importance for cultural reasons (this notion may be part of a more general, and widespread way of opposing a reified West to an equally reified India). The arguments put forward may vary. However, they all converge to create the idea that, generally speaking, territory in India had, and still has, little value as a cognitive category. This book aims at radically reconsidering this perspective.

Social anthropology and the study of territory

For long the social sciences have largely ignored the question of territory. It is only from the 1980s onwards that geographers, whom one would think to have been concerned with this topic long ago, have really begun to interest themselves in territories, not only in their political but also in their symbolic dimension, as objects of discourse and representation.¹ Paradoxically, debates among them seem to have been initiated by a perception of the 'end of territory' as a consequence of globalization. According to some, the category had thus become obsolete at the very moment it came into focus. The trend concerns now all the social sciences, so much that the French Ministry of Education and Research recently (2003) advertised an offer to substantially fund projects that would study 'Space and territory: society, economy, culture, language, representations', stating that 'social sciences and humanities have mostly elaborated their knowledge by ignoring the spatial dimension of human actions', but that processes at work in the contemporary world (i.e. globalization) involve a great number of academic disciplines in the geographical turn 'spreading in the social sciences, not only -as would be obvious- in geography, but also in economy..., in urban sociology, in political sciences..., in anthropology, in history, in linguistics, in the genetics of populations, and in cognitive sciences.'

As far as anthropology is concerned, a similar diagnostic has been made in numerous recent publications. As one of them put it, 'the exploration of how notions of belonging, localities and identities are constructed seems particularly relevant in current political contexts of "globalisation"' (Lovell 1998b: 1). One of the first and most influent publications on this theme was a collection of papers edited in 1988 by Arjun Appadurai in a special number of Cultural Anthropology on 'Place and Voice in Anthropological Theory', where the focus was more specifically on the problem of ‘culturally defined locations to which ethnographies refer’ (Appadurai 1988: 16). The discussion was further elaborated in various later works. Gupta and Ferguson (1997), for instance, emphasize that we should be raising questions about ‘anthropology’s implicit mapping of the world as a series of discrete, territorialized cultures’, and that at a time when ‘cultural difference is increasingly becoming deterritorialized because of mass migrations and transnational culture flows of a late capitalist, postcolonial world... there is obviously a special interest in understanding the way that questions of identity and cultural difference are spatialized in new ways. The circumstances of an accelerating “global cultural ecumene”... make the project of exploring the intertwined processes of place making and people making in the complex cultural politics of the nation-state an especially vital part of the contemporary anthropological agenda’ (Gupta and Ferguson 1997: 3-4).

In this general context of rethinking the anthropologist’s location as well as the way identities may relate to space in a globalized world, there have been essays reflecting on the very notions of space and place as something that may be a ‘problem’ in contemporary anthropological theory, which ‘arises, paradoxically, because the meaning of place too often seems to go without saying’ (Rodman 1992: 640).² However, as the author argues, places are socially constructed with multiple meanings, and ‘anthropologists would do well to follow geographers’ renewed interest [...] in reunifying location (i.e., the spatial distribution of socioeconomic activity such as trade networks), sense of place (or attachment to place), and locale (the setting in which a particular social activity occurs, such as a church) to yield a more rounded understanding of places as culturally and socially constructed in practice’ (Rodman 1992: 643).³

In a short but influent seminal paper⁴ on ‘heterotopias’, Michel Foucault stressed that ‘the present epoch will perhaps be above all the epoch of space’ (Foucault 1986: 22). ‘In any case’, he wrote, ‘I believe that the anxiety of our era has to do fundamentally with space, no doubt a great deal more than with time’. But this was not to be the same space as was known earlier. According to him, ‘today the site has been substituted for extension which itself had replaced emplacement... Our epoch is one in which space takes for us the form of relations among sites’ (ibid.23). How much this intuition had foreseen later developments in the social sciences (and especially in anthropology) is evident in the fact that all the works previously mentioned deal mostly, if not exclusively, with the question of sites, of identities in relation to space. In other words, the ‘geographical turn’ in social science studies appears also to be overwhelmingly a culturalist turn.⁵ For instance, geographer Bonnemaïson argues that ‘human territoriality may be defined by the cultural relationship that a group or a society maintains with... the web of places and the system of itineraries that frame its space. References to biological-like concepts of “closure” such as appropriation or frontiers is not always a prime necessity: territory in fact refers more to the notion of identity than to security’ (Bonnemaïson 1995: 71, our translation).

This was indeed what S. Feld and K.H. Basso observed in their 1996 review of the then existing literature on the subject, when they wrote that ‘the recent topicalization of place by cultural anthropologists has mostly been concerned with theorizing social identities’ (Feld and Basso 1996b: 4). According to them, recent research in anthropology theorized place ‘largely from the standpoint of its contestation’, a development that ‘surely reflects the now acute world conditions of exile, displacement, diasporas, and inflamed borders, to say nothing of the increasingly tumultuous struggles by indigenous peoples and cultural minorities for ancestral homelands, land rights and retention of sacred places'. As a consequence, anthropologists have come to worry 'about places as sites of power struggles or about displacement as histories of annexation, absorption, and resistance' (ibid.: 4-5).

This statement certainly accounts for the perspective taken in the two volumes edited by Appadurai (1988) and Gupta and Ferguson (1997). However, as Feld and Basso noticed, ethnographic accounts centered on the social construction of particular localities 'were few and far between' (ibid.: 6). Their own collection of contributions (as well as Rodman 1992, Hirsch and O'Hanlon 1995 and Lovell 1998a) therefore endeavoured to explore the 'complex ways in which places anchor lives in social formations ranging widely in geographical location, in economic and political scale, and in accompanying realms of gender, race, class, and ethnicity' (Feld and Basso 1996b: 7).

To sum up, the spate of anthropological writing on space since the late 1980s appears to follow two main trends. One is concerned with the location of the anthropologists and the people they study in a globalized world said to be characterized by deterritorialized culture. The other deals with perceptions and experience of lived-in places. Despite their differences, the two approaches partake of common preoccupations. Both are mostly, if not exclusively, focused on the question of the definition of identities. And both scarcely -if at all- mention such a word as 'territory', except in its derivative form 'deterritorialization'. Instead, there is a full array of seemingly connected notions such as 'space', 'place', 'location', 'site', and 'landscape'. Suggestive as they may be in their own right, these concepts are quite distinct from the notion of territory, which seems to have altogether disappeared from the profession's interests.⁶ In thirty-one years of the Annual Review of Anthropology, significantly, there is not one bibliographical review that mentions in its title 'territory', or concerns itself with the topic. How can we account for such a disinterest?

The main cause could well be the exclusive stress put on culture and identities that has led most anthropologists in recent times to distrust the very notion of territory by assimilating it -we suppose- with the notion of cultural or ethnic boundaries. There is now a widely shared 'discomfort with the idea of bounded cultural units', to use Appadurai's words (Appadurai 1988b: 20). Indeed, we too feel such a discomfort. But it is our contention that it has little to do with the question of territory, and that conflating the two notions, 'territory' and 'bounded cultural unit' (if it were to happen) would be groundless. They just are not coterminous, as territory does not primarily refer to culture or identity, but to rights.

Ordinary definitions of the term in standard dictionaries give, for instance, 'land, especially land under one ruler or government' or 'the land and waters under a jurisdiction'; 'a political subdivision of a country'; 'an area for which a person is responsible as a representative or agent: a salesperson's territory', etc. Clearly, the notion of territory refers to notions of jurisdiction, of power, of rights,⁷ but does not necessarily relate to cultural units or to group identities. People within a salesperson's territory may not be aware of the existence and the limits of this territory, and certainly need not develop a common perception of identity. While rights of a like nature define mutually exclusive territories, rights of different nature define different kinds of territories that may overlap and combine over a single stretch of land. A territory may be discontinuous geographically, its limits may be fluid, fuzzy, contested. But only in some specific cases does it intersect with the question of cultural identities.

A major example of such an intersection is, of course, the modern nation-state, where a territory, a political regime, a people and a culture are claimed to be ideally one and the same. This late development can by no means be taken as the model for reflecting on territory -such a standpoint, we feel, acted as a deterrent for fully recognizing the existence of territories in India, as we shall be showing later. Rather, one should consider its specificity against the many other forms of territorial organization that were, and still are, prevalent in the world.

While the present contributions participate in a wider movement currently taking place in the social sciences, which tends to give full importance to conceptions of space, they also try to explore a category –territory- that has elicited remarkably little interest among anthropologists in recent years. We feel, however, that there is much to gain in such a study, the more so because nation-state centred interpretations have tended to obscure the understanding of the complex interplay of territories in social life.

At the same time, the essays in this volume try to relate to a more specific tradition of Indian studies, and to contest some of its own peculiar stereotypes. The paradox is that for this region of the world, the notion of territory was far from being simply ignored. On the contrary it has been the object of diverse speculations, many of them concluding that it was of secondary importance and quite dispensable. Our discussion will first review the various arguments that were put forward to justify such a stand, before evoking the few attempts made to stress anew the importance of territory in India.

Territory in India

The most enduring stereotype that characterizes so many studies of India is that in this society there were neither territories properly speaking nor boundaries, at least in pre-colonial times -an interpretation that has led scholars to assert for instance that ‘territory cannot be seen as a primary constituent of the Indian state’ (Wink 1986: 161), or that ‘the Indian political tradition... ascribed but an ambiguous and subordinated place to territory’ (Jaffrelot 1996: 75, our translation).

On the contrary, as has been said, the present collection of essays aims at showing through some well-defined cases the crucial import of territory in India since ancient times, not only in the definition and the regulation of effective social, political, and religious relationships, but also as a category that has explicit cognitive value, as an object of symbolic activity, representations, and debates. The scope is therefore wider than a study of political territories alone, as the very nature of the objections raised by various authors against valuing their importance could not but lead to take into account a diversity of domains related to the various conceptualizations of territory in India. A brief review of these positions may not be out of place.

In their manifesto launched in 1957 at the occasion of the first number of Contributions to Indian Sociology, with the intention to contest the importance that was given at the time to the notion of the village as a sociological unit,⁸ L.Dumont and D.L.Pocock wrote that the ‘territorial factor, the relation to the soil is not, in India as a whole, one of the primary factors in social organisation. It is a secondary factor in relation to the two fundamental factors of kinship and caste' (Dumont and Pocock 1957: 18). Dumont himself had elaborated on this notion in his monograph study on the Kallars of Tamil Nadu, where he made a detailed study of local territorial units. In this work he concluded that 'kinship remains the fundamental principle of organization, and it becomes a factor in political organization once it is qualified or mediated so to speak, by the territorial principle' (Dumont 1986 [1957]: 184). With nuances, this was more or less the position held by many other authors. For example, A.C. Mayer, writing at the same period, underlined the importance of locality in breeding 'village patriotism' (overriding, often, caste divisions), but concluded also that kinship is essential in defining territorial units: 'this makes the region a fluid and rather unsatisfactory structural concept...The "territory" of Ramkheri subcaste group is a variable kinship-territory' (Mayer 1960: 271-2). Similarly, Richard G. Fox found that in northern India 'the territorial state does not prove preeminent over local kin-defined political and economic bodies' (Fox 1971: 168).⁹ In the present volume, Chapter 6 by Gérard Toffin is a critical contribution to this specific discussion and illustrates, among other things, that kinship and territory need not be set up as exclusive alternatives, but help mutually define each other.¹⁰

As an important variant in the arguments conducive to a devaluation of territory in relation to caste, Dumont later developed an alternative theory, in which kinship lost its role in favour of what he called the caste system's 'ideology'. According to his well-known formula, 'the ideology ignores territory as such' (Dumont 1966: 196). There, 'ideology' relates to the basic opposition between purity and impurity, the fundamental logic behind the 'caste system' in Dumont's theory. Such an assertion, in his view, was not meant to deny the empirical evidence of territorial facts, on which he himself had worked in detail. However, his quest for an overarching structural principle giving coherence to 'Indian civilisation' (a preoccupation that went back to the first issue of Contributions to Indian Sociology in 1957) led him to an a priori subordination of what he called the empirical level to the ideological. In his words, the ideological level in India 'does not account for the territorial factor, ignores it and encompasses it' (ibid.: 67). Many essays in the present volume address and contest this perspective, for instance the contributions by Michel Angot and Gérard Colas (Chapters 1 and 2) that historicize the sharp contrast existing at the 'ideological level' between a Vedic ritualistic discourse, devaluing fixation in permanent places, and later Brahmanical developments, valuing the local entrenchment of gods.

Dumont's theory has been widely criticised from different perspectives,¹¹ but his specific point about territory was in fact little, if at all discussed. While most of his critics did not address the issue, some did so, but often considered territory as a mere part of the politico-economic sphere, a reductionism that could not really confront Dumont's perspective.¹² Thus, in a way, it is somewhat paradoxical that Dumont has been one of the few anthropologists to have discussed at length the notion of territory as such, under various aspects – village community, village gods, territorial segmentation of castes, concepts of property, and royal power¹³ – in order to demonstrate that it was of secondary importance in relation to caste and 'ideology'.

Another line of argument that has tended to devaluate the importance of territory in India pertains to a denial of the links between people -or some of them- with the place they live in. For instance Sanskritist Charles Malamoud suggested once that there is nowadays a 'weak “territoriality” of the Indian village’, to be paralleled with the fact that ‘ancestors in India have no earthly abode’ (Malamoud 1996 [1976]: 75 n.7). A similar reasoning has been made by anthropologist Yasushi Uchiyamada (1995) when he argued that depressed castes in Kerala, who bury their dead, develop more attachment to the land than upper castes who practise cremation. On the basis of factual observation, the argument is altogether unconvincing, since in this region members of high castes, too, define their identity through strong references to an ancestral land (Tarabout 1991) However, coming from a social anthropologist who certainly would not see himself as an ‘Orientalist’, such a repetition of the argument suggests how widespread can be the scholarly prejudices against the importance of territory in India.

It has to be acknowledged that the so-called ‘ethnosociology’ approach theorized by McKim Marriott has fostered a much more nuanced approach towards the relationship between people and the soil. Inspired by transactionalism, ‘ethnosociology’ interprets many characteristics of Indian society, particularly castes, in terms of a circulation of substances, especially bodily substances (Marriott and Inden 1974; Marriott 1990). The qualities of various beings are determined by the nature of ‘coded substances’ that are exchanged between all of them. Interactions are thus able to constantly modify beings. In order to regulate these fluxes and these influences, rules of avoidance or acceptance are established, which are at the core of caste society. This theoretical frame leaves no room for the notion of territory, strictly speaking. It may have encouraged some forms of ‘locationism’, so to say, but no interest in delimited jurisdictions.¹⁴ Yet it has definitely opened up a new line of analysis conferring a crucial importance to the soil, in the sense of a geographical milieu linked to identities, or more precisely as an ecological environment with which people are in a constant exchange of ‘substances’.

Marriott did not himself elaborate much on the topic, but some of his ideas have been fruitfully developed by other scholars, most notably by E.V.Daniel (1984). Writing about the Tamil village he studied, Daniel begins by stressing the importance of the notion of soil: ‘one of the most important relationships to a Tamil is that which exists between a person and the soil of his ūr [village]’ (Daniel 1984: 63).¹⁵ He then proceeds to discuss the notion of ūr, which is not always restricted to ‘village’ but may take different meanings according to situations. For example, it is an external space ‘defined person-centrally in terms of its relevance to a given ego rather than in terms of a purely semantic category that refers to a bounded territory common to all Tamils at all times and in all places’ (ibid.: 68). When ūr specifically refers to the village, the corresponding territory can be conceived according to two contrasting modes: either as an administrative unit with fixed and continuous limits; or as a lived space with the ‘focus on the center of the village and with a vulnerable “frontier” or a periphery’ (ibid.: 77) marked by ‘shrines of sentinel deities, entering points of roads and streams, haunted tamarind trees that dot the edge of the village’ (ibid.: 74).

Daniel's book has become a reference for any discussion on the symbolic dimension of the relationships that people have with land in India. Indeed, he achieved a tour de force by conciliating the idea of humoral transactions in constant flux, at the core of ethnosociological theory, and its criticism by Moffatt: ‘Why are physical, spatial boundaries so important in south Indian villages if flow is so valued?’ (Moffatt 1990: 225). In stressing the crucial cognitive importance in India of the various bonds that link people to the land, Daniel has been able to hold together the notion of a flux of exchanges between people and the soil, and the notion of village territory, though he remained somewhat ambiguous in his formulations about the latter's limits.

In preparing this volume, therefore, we were faced with two disparate sets of arguments concerning a possible relationship between soil and territory. One argued that a supposed lack of territoriality was linked to a supposed lack of attachment to ancestors. The other one stressed the existence of constant flows of exchange between soil and people, but nevertheless entertained also little concern for territory proper, in the sense we have defined above (with the exception of Daniel's work). It was then necessary that the present book bring its own perspective on the question, and three chapters deal with the subject: Chapter 3 by Phyllis Granoff, Chapter 4 by Caterina Guenzi and Sunita Singh, and Chapter 5 by Caroline and Filippo Osella. It should be clear, however, that while these chapters amply demonstrate the elaborateness of conceptions that stress the mutual determination of places and people, they do not claim to establish that it equates soil with territory. As has been underlined before, the notions are just not of the same nature, though obviously they may intersect. But it was felt to be important, in this volume, to show that there exist in India explicit discourses establishing the identities of people with reference to their native or living well-circumscribed places.¹⁶

A third and last group of arguments may be described as the acknowledgment that territory did play a role in political relationships in ancient times (pre-colonial, or pre-Mughal, depending on the authors), but that it was no 'real' territory, so to say. Some would hold for instance that Hindu kingdoms, prior to the colonial period, were not so much defined by their limits than by the network of personal relationships that developed between the king and those who recognised his power. In this sense, the notion of territory is irrelevant, even 'fallacious' (Wink 1986: 47). Instead, 'we find a people-cum-territory or janapada, shot through with vested rights' (ibid.: 161). This notion was already pinpointed by Dumont when he argued that according to the (Brahmanical) model of Hindu kingship, territory was undifferentiated from its population (Dumont 1991: 489).¹⁷ This standpoint, however, has been contradicted by other scholars using the same Sanskrit references as Dumont, and underlining the importance of territory in the exercise of royal power that these texts make clear. The historian of law R. Lingat (1967), for instance, showed that in the Dharmaśāstra and the Manusmṛti, royal power is closely associated with the notion of kṣatra, 'a power which is territorial in character, not only because it is applied within a territory and ends at the frontiers of the kingdom, but because it is conceived... as a regal right on territory, akin to a proprietary right that gives a direct power on land and soil' (Lingat 1967: 237, our translation). Lingat's conclusion, however, was seldom heard.

One argument that has been put forward was to affirm that, since every Hindu sovereign considered himself to be virtually a Universal Ruler, there was no room for the notion of territory, which thus had little pertinence for defining kingdoms. Based on texts and rituals that predate our era, this conception of kingship has been widely circulated and may be found in Buddhism as well as in the claims of any local Hindu chieftain of the recent past. We should however not confuse the image of power that these chieftains may have wanted to project, and the nature of this power. Some authors have been cautious enough in this respect and have considered that the symbolic order that was thus proclaimed, probably had only but ‘a distant relationship with reality’ and that, eventually, ‘if there is an idea to remember, it is that kings ruled over a limited territory in the constant expectative of a war’ (Biardeau 1982: 31 ff., our translation). Others have been less cautious. There has been for instance the suggestion that ‘in the Hindu classical conceptions, the territorial extent was less important than its religious signification’ (Jaffrelot 1996: 75, our translation; also Galey 1989).

Moreover, even authors who have recognized the past importance of the notion of territory in the relationships between kingdoms, have often dismissed the existence of their precise delimitation. Thus, according to some, ‘the country was divided into political entities whose borders were defined by their centre rather than the peripheries, the opposite of the concept of limes, limits between states. That system continued till the reign of the Mughals’ (Dupont and Landy 2005: 48). And even if the past existence of frontiers ‘in the sense of zonal regions’, with their fortified outposts and toll-bars, is readily acknowledged, ‘this is no evidence that linear boundaries were known’ (Embree 197: 260).

Obviously, such conclusions rely on a comparison with an ideal-type of territory that closely corresponds to the specific form it has assumed in the modern nation-state (Anderson 1983; Goswami 1998). In our view, as already pointed out, such a stand is detrimental for developing any fruitful analysis of the relationships that may exist between societies and space: such a definition of ‘territory’ necessarily ends up in an a priori negation of any territorial logic in societies prior to the appearance of the modern nation-state; and even within today’s nation-states, the analysis would be applicable only at one level, that of the nation, and not at various scales of observation within it. In the wake we would lose any ability to shed light on the historical processes by which this specific form of territorial construction has emerged, or on the rather recent manifestations it has entailed in terms of ‘ethnicity’. We stand by our definition of territory as primarily a notion about jurisdiction, and we argue that, yes, territories in India have been for centuries inseparable from the exercise of political power, and, yes, these territories were often known in very precise terms through well-defined limits. The last part of the volume is thus dedicated to this discussion. Two chapters (Chapter 7 by Gilles Tarabout and Chapter 8 by Daniela Berti) are case studies of territorial entanglements between religious and political jurisdictions. A third and ultimate chapter by Christiane Brosius illustrates some aspects of the current ‘ethnicization’ of politics in contemporary India, as a recent development of territorial conceptions within the nation-state.

Before concluding this review, it has to be stated that besides the general trends that have been presented, there has been also many works that have provided descriptions and analyses conclusively showing the importance of soil and territory in India, in observed individual and social practices as well as in explicit discourses.¹⁸ Historian Nicholas Dirks has for instance criticised Dumont for his devaluation of the importance of territory (said to be secondary in relation to kinship) in the latter's monograph on Kallars: ‘My ethnographic construction of the Kallars in Pudukottai leads me to challenge Dumont's theory on a number of important points. Territory, for example, plays a major role at every level of social definition. It is so embedded within social and political forms that we cannot say that it merely mediates the political and social domains as Dumont suggests’ (Dirks 1993: 258). Other authors have underlined the importance and relevance of territory for a great variety of social contexts, such as the regional configuration of caste relationships (Miller 1954), the elaboration of a mythical past by inhabitants of urban neighbourhoods (Parkhill 1993), the power that is still today exercised by local deities within their specific jurisdiction (Sax 1991, Berti 2001, Tarabout 1999), the prevalence of localized codes of conduct for Brahmans (Chakrabarti 2000),¹⁹ the bonds that migrant workers keep with their village of origin (Racine 1994), the territorial self-representation of commercial networks found in some merchant castes (Mines 1984), or the enduring links that married women maintain with their natal family (Sax 2000) or village (Lambert 1996). In the latter case, Lambert has shown that the birth-place is a significant dimension of one's identity, and that the stress put either on caste or on kinship, or on place in order to define one's identity, may be of a strategic nature. The author does not limit her critique to the question of the supposed subordination of territory to caste, but extends it also to its alleged exclusion from the system of conscious ideas and values: 'local identity is an indigenous value and thereby constitutes an aspect of conscious ideology different from that of caste' (Lambert 1996: 116).

Thus, territorial facts in India have imposed themselves on the attention of numerous observers, and could be negated or said to be of secondary importance only when there exists interpretative prejudice. At the same time, they still open a wide array of questions for discussion and interpretation. The present volume aims at addressing some of them. Without trying to be exhaustive in any way, given the immensity and the complexity of the Indian subcontinent, it is based on a diversified set of studies, varied both in historical and regional scope. The book therefore combines a great diversity of sources (ethnography, archives, texts and inscriptions), used by authors who have specialized in different disciplines (Indology, history of religion, social anthropology). Such diverse approaches and methodologies have been organized together in order to provide contrasting pictures of the plural conceptions and symbolic manipulations of territory in the Indian world. Three contributions by Sanskritists, each a specialist of a different period and of different texts, will precede papers of anthropological perspective. They introduce a necessary historicity, as some objections to the importance of territory in India relied on interpretations of Brahmanical texts, taken to express some kind of timeless cultural disinterest for attachment to place, for territory, and for boundaries.

Summary

Without strictly following a chronological order, the succession of contributions is arranged so as to begin with the ancient period and end with today's developments. However, the main objective in organizing the book has been to deal step by step with the arguments that have just been presented. The volume is thus divided into three main parts. The first, 'Emergence of Divine Territories in Brahmanical Texts', is a preliminary discussion of some 'ideological' aspects of territory in ancient India. The second, 'Land, Soil, and Sense of Belonging', deals not so much with territory per se than with the allegation that cultural or theological reasons prevent some people in India from developing attachment with their native or living place. The third and most developed part, 'Religious and Political Territories', is a discussion of various kinds of territorial jurisdictions –with a last development about today's Hindutva claims for an 'ethnicized' national territory (Jaffrelot 1996).

We begin with a preliminary question: to what extent are there ideas in Brahmanical thinking that actually point to a devaluation of the notion of territory (and to what extent do they relate to practice)?

The first chapter by Michel Angot shows that Vedic texts definitely expressed a strong devaluation of the notion of localized, bounded place, and conversely put an extreme positive value on open space – at least as far as the Gods were concerned. While the hierarchy of values is unambiguous in these texts, understanding the way it did inform practice may prove more conjectural. Certainly, this was well in line with the way public sacrifices, the srauta rituals, could not be reiterated in the same spot, and with the full symbolism of such rituals. But, as pointed out by the author himself, these texts bear on ritual practice and on conceptions about the divine realm, and should not be taken as directly applying to the social world. As a matter of fact, even if these values are plainly congruent with the standard hypothesis of a nomadic origin of the Vedic first people, the development of Vedic rituals as elaborated in the ritual literature corresponds to a period when they applied for centuries within a well settled agricultural society. Today itself, Vedic srauta rituals may occasionally be re-enacted (with their valuation on open space) in the contemporary, well-territorialized Indian society. Clearly, values inform social life, but not necessarily in a mechanical way. In terms of a general theory, this should lead one to be very cautious about ideas about the ‘spirit’, the ‘ethos’ of a society or an economic system (Max Weber), or the ‘ideology’ of Indian civilization (Louis Dumont). In the specific perspective of the present volume, the positive value given to open space and the correlated devaluation of bounded places did apply well to the Vedic vision of the divine, but it may well have been circumscribed to this particular context in the developments of religion and society in India, and does not mean that Vedic society was devoid of territories, or that the ideology presented here was the only existing model. Contemporary ritual contexts that are proper to the Brahmans are still associated with Vedic deities that are ‘delocalized’, but often coexist at the same time with other models in which gods and goddesses are grounded in a specific territory, owned by them.²⁰

Chapter 2 by Gérard Colas suggests some aspects of the historical shift in Brahmanical traditions from Vedic speculations towards later, very different conceptions. Epigraphic and textual sources of the fourth and fifth centuries C.E. refer to sedentary deities installed in temples in villages and towns. This sedentary character goes hand in hand with the existence of physical images of the divine (absent from Vedic references). Gods now have a physical body, more or less anthropomorphic, and are actors within a local society. The texts and inscriptions bear witness to the sometimes heated debates about the development of temple rituals and the possible implication of Brahmans in them. They testify also to the growing body of lands donated to them for the maintenance of cults. But if the link between divine image and temple ground is assumed quite early in the texts, there is a reluctance to admit that gods themselves may become landowners, and it takes many centuries for the literate society to accept it through various phraseologies. It is in this context that explicit discourses on divine territory appear -discourses that are plural and sometimes contradictory.

Taken together, these two chapters concur in their analysis of the decisive evolution in Brahmanical theories and ritual practices that lead from an uncompromised positive valuation of open space in the Vedic period, at least for the gods, to the latter's radical inscription in lands and territories. Clearly, when speaking about territory, the Brahmanical 'ideology' - to use Dumont's expression- is much more complex than a mere reference to Vedic speculation would suggest, not only in matters of land and society, but also in theological elaboration. The process has been a tense one, spanning centuries, but there is clearly no ground today to define Brahmanical conceptions of territory, even in the religious sphere, by referring merely to the early Vedic period. On the contrary, the process itself suggests the strength of territorial realities in Indian society for at least two thousand years, so much so that these forced themselves into the divine world.

LAND, SOIL, AND SENSE OF BELONGING

The following set of three chapters investigates a concept related to territory, but distinct from it, as already underlined: the concept of soil, and more generally the relationships between lands and identities. There are two points that are sought to be made.

At the general level of anthropological theory, the first illustrates that the interrelations between places and people do not necessarily entail the existence of a territory in the sense of a jurisdiction, as previously discussed. Nevertheless, it suggests also that 'space' does not exist as such (a point elaborately discussed in Casey 1996), and that land, in the sense of places or soil, cannot be dissociated from society in all its heterogeneities and particularities.

At the level of this volume's specific argument, the second point is to underline the importance in India of these perceptions for understanding how people come to identify themselves, or be identified by others, with the land -that is, how they claim, or are said to 'belong' to it.

This sense of belonging is addressed here in three ways. Chapter 3, by Phyllis Granoff, is a study of identifications made in medieval Buddhist, Jain, and Hindu texts between regions and the people living there or originating from them. These are strongly worded stereotypes in which the people's characteristics, qualities, and behaviour are said to be determined by the very place where they live or where they come from. Such kinds of prejudice, Granoff argues, may well have been of immediate import for the delimitation of so-called sectarian divisions of the time, where religious sectarian identities may have papered over deep social divisions grounded on regional differentiation. In her words, 'ritual was merely put in the service of a more fundamental marker of difference to give what was not originally a religious difference a definitely religious tone.'

The other two chapters in this part are based on micro-level field studies. Through a study of present-day Varanasi astrologers, Caterina Guenzi and Sunita Singh (Chapter 4) are able to show that Brahmanical elaborations and practices of geomancy are based on a typology of soils and on their supposed respective interactions with different classes of society. Land enables astrologers to divine good or bad prospects for its inhabitants, as they share its effects on them according to their own respective qualities, and as in turn they affect land's characteristics. One aspect of Brahmanical 'ideology', therefore, provides for a luminous illustration of the extent to which land, person, and society may be mutually determined.

Caroline and Filippo Osella's study of the interactions between land and people as they are conceived in Central Kerala (Chapter 5) amply corroborates this statement. By examining the rules that preside over the construction of a new house in order to establish harmonious relationships between a site and those who will live there, and the funeral practices of some of the castes of the region, they shed light on an intricate life-and-death cycle binding together people with their place and with the surrounding lands that provide them their sustenance. These findings accord well with previous anthropological works which stress the importance of humoral transactions in defining social identities in India (McKim Marriott, Daniel). They suggest, in addition, a possible specificity of Kerala in this matter, where it seems that a particular stress is given on the extremely intimate bonds that such transactions create between places and the life and identity of the people born or living there. Expressed in the specific language of transactionalist theory, this question is akin to the already much debated one about the relations between kinship and territory, to which many authors have answered by suggesting the primacy of kinship. This discussion is taken up again in the first chapter of part 3, along a different theoretical line of analysis.

The second part, then, provides three examples of how places and people are said to determine each others in India, be it in the case of ancient regional stereotypes, or of the learned theories and practices of geomancy among contemporary urban Brahmans, or of the vital exchanges that are said to occur between specific places and their inhabitants in today's Kerala. Soil, identities and events are intimately intertwined. There is a perception of an 'inequality' of places (so to say) linked to personal or social inequalities, and eventually a strong sense of rooting in the land, a 'sense of belonging' (Lovell) to well-defined places.

RELIGIOUS AND POLITICAL TERRITORIES

While such a 'sense of belonging' points to a personal or social identity expressed in terms of place, it does not necessarily entail identification with a territory, as already underlined; conversely, one may belong to a territory without developing any specific 'sense of belonging' to it, as is often the case with administrative circumscriptions, for instance. However, and without any necessary connection with the model of the modern nation-state, complex and multiple interplays between places and territories, between identities and jurisdictions, do often happen and they structure social groupings in depth. The last set of four chapters investigates such varying social and political dimensions of territories, understood as spatial divisions determined by the exercise of rights and power.

Gérard Toffin (Chapter 6) analyses the conception of territory among the Newars in the Kathmandu Valley of Nepal. Territory, there, is defined through various divine jurisdictions at the level of the whole village or of sections of it, through ritual marks at the boundary of villages, and through funerary associations whose membership relies on both lineage and residence, and whose elders are the effective chiefs of the village. Territory and kinship are particularly tightly bound together, so much so that the author speaks of 'territorial parentages', in which territory relegates to a secondary level the importance of blood relationships in the constitution of social groupings. Symbolic territories, imbued with a deep sense of belonging and local identities, are thus also in this case effective, well delimited judicial and political territories, in which the full control of the social life of the inhabitants is exercised.

The next two chapters are case studies of religious territories, with a very precise delimitation of their boundaries and an effective political import in the control of land and people. Such territories, which answer the strictest definition of the term, do not depend on the model of the nation-state, and appear to have been widely prevalent in India. Historically, they did –and sometimes continue to- interact with the political organization of the former kingdoms, of the colonial power, or of the contemporary Indian nation-state.

Gilles Tarabout (Chapter 7) develops a case study of a long-lasting dispute which opposed the former kingdoms of Cochin and of Travancore over the territory of a temple. The case exemplifies the multiple forms of territory that once structured power relationships in Kerala, and the changes in their conception that occurred between the end of the seventeenth and the end of the nineteenth century. From a multiplicity of fragmented, embedded territories of different natures and importance, there is a progressive change to the notion of a unified territory that is characteristic of the modern nation-state. Thus, far from a lack of territory in pre-colonial India, it could be said that there was an excess of them. But these territories were multiple, sometimes discontinuous, and regularly overlapping, as very different rights applied to a same tract of land. At a broader level of observation this might give the impression of ‘fuzzy’ boundaries, while they were in fact very precise and well delimited at the micro level. The specific autonomy that was granted to some temple jurisdictions led in some cases to legal battles between growing state powers, which provide an exceptional opportunity for reconstructing what ultimately led to the establishment of modern bureaucratic states in the region. This evolution corresponds to a simplification, standardization, and political centralization of previous territories, but definitely not to the invention of the notion.

Daniela Berti’s study of divine jurisdictions in Himachal Pradesh (Chapter 8) analyses the territorial aspects of the cults of village deities. These deities have specific and well-delimited jurisdictions, and the corresponding territories are examined in relation to the different political systems that have successively controlled the region –Hindu kingdoms, British colonial administration, and the democratic system of contemporary India. The author uses various sources, oral stories, manuscripts of former British administrators, and contemporary observation in order to demonstrate the extent to which local deities were, and still are, at the core of local perceptions of territory. Not only do they still function as ritual units, and as instances of arbitrage for ordinary litigation, but they have been the source for defining the limits of colonial and post-colonial administrative divisions, tax assessment units, and electoral circumscriptions. In this case, religious territories centred on village deities appear to have been the mould for economic administration and political dynamics, while retaining their relevance in the current religious life of the people.

The history of how India as a nation-state has come into being has been told at length in numerous scholarly publications, and is not repeated here. The social and historical processes leading to the conception of India as a bounded whole has, for instance, been brought to light by Goswami (1998; 2004). The present volume concludes with a study by Christiane Brosius about the ways in which religious nationalism has developed in recent years (Chapter 9). Brosius explores particularly the relationships between the religious construction of territories and electoral politics at the time of the pan-Indian processions organized by the Hindu right at the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s.²¹ The analysis focuses on some videos that were made about these so-called patriotic pilgrimages, which relied on an explicitly religious imagination and rhetoric so as to develop a ‘mysticism of the territory’, to use Jaffrelot's expression (Jaffrelot 1996: 92). For Jaffrelot, the ideology propagated by the RSS leads to a devaluation of administrative frontiers in favour of cultural ones. To the territorial nationalism it opposes an ‘ethnic conception of the nation that structures the “Indian land” by exclusive reference to elements that are relevant in terms of cultural roots. Points of reference in the landscape are especially given a national value through a reinterpretation of the signification they may possess in the Hindu tradition’ (Jaffrelot 1999: 93, our translation). Such a traditional sacred geography was particularly studied by D. Eck (1981, 1998), who has shown how ritual processions and pilgrimages are instrumental in the elaboration of Hindu visions of ‘an “imagined landscape” in which networks of pilgrimage places have generated a powerful sense of land and location’ (Eck 1998: 166). The author goes on to suggest that ‘in a range of Hindu traditions, map-making has been the domain of both the cosmologists and mythmakers, and it is arguable that the imagined landscape they have created is far more culturally powerful than that displayed on the Bartholomew's map’ (ibid.: 169).

As Christiane Brosius demonstrates in her contribution, this imagined landscape has been the support on which the Hindu right has tried to politically mobilize the electorate. The videos that are analysed here reveal the constant use of evocations of an impending menace collectively threatening a united Hindu people. This is expressed at the mythical level (the loss of a Hindu Golden Age), at the level of (a revised) history, and at the level of biological metaphors (the nation as a kindred family), all concurring in producing an imagined and diversified landscape for a claimed ‘Hindu territory’. In this, we find a process of trying to redefine a political frame in terms of a religious and ethnicized territory. Militants identify the whole of India with a national soil (sometimes blurring the limits of international borders), towards which a sense of belonging is exclusively equated with Hinduness.

Soil and identities, divine and administrative jurisdictions, landmarks and territorial boundaries, all these ways in which relations to the land concur in the formation of social groupings are present and intertwined in this last case, as they were in the different other chapters of this volume. But they appear in a radically new configuration and organize the State at an unprecedented level in a typically nationalistic, nativistic way. ‘Nation’ in this understanding –and not the existence of territories - is the recent product of ‘modernity’. It is thus a comparison with other societies that these studies eventually invite, but a comparison based on the recognition of the historicity and plurality of territorial organizations that are at the core of human relationships.

NOTES

Acknowledgments: The essays in this volume are part of a collection originally published in Italian in 2003, as a special number of Etnosistemi, Processi e dinamiche culturali (n°10, ‘Terra, territorio e società nel mondo indiano’). We thank the publisher, CISU, Roma, for kindly authorizing their publication in English. The contributions have been revised, and the introduction entirely rewritten for the present edition - we are grateful to the anonymous reader for her/his insightful and stimulating comments.

1. For instance in France, Lévy 1991; Géographie et Cultures n°20; Di Méo 2000.
2. Also Geertz (1996).

3. At least three major volumes that reflect such preoccupations were published in the following years: Hirsch and O'Hanlon (1995); Feld and Basso (1996a); Lovell (1998a).
4. Published in English in 1986 but pronounced as a communication as early as 1967.
5. For a discussion see Bonnemaison and Cambrezy 1996.
6. Among the few exceptions (in French anthropology) may be mentioned Godelier (1978), and Vincent, Dory and Verdier (1995).
7. This was underlined by R.D.Sack in his sophisticated theorization of territoriality, defined as 'the attempt to affect, influence or control actions and interactions (of people, things, and relationships) by asserting and attempting to enforce control over a geographic area' (Sack 1983: 55). We thank Frédéric Landy for communicating us this reference.
8. See for instance Srinivas (1960), as well as Bailey (1959).
9. See also the critical reviews of this work by Galey (1973) and Stern (1973). More recently, see Jamous (2003 [1991]).
10. A perspective that had many exponents for other societies in the world (for instance, recently, Liberski-Bagnoud 2002), but was seldom applied to South Asia.
11. Contrary to arguments forwarded by many of Dumont's critics, his position should not be understood as merely resulting from an 'orientalistic' approach, in the sense popularized by E. Said. Dumont was a meticulous and scrupulous observer, whose monograph provides an impressive amount of precise empirical data. His choice of interpretation has to be referred to his overall intellectual project, which may be very roughly characterized as inherited from both Marcel Mauss (of whom he had been a student) and Max Weber (his notion of 'ideology' may not be very different from what Weber meant by 'ethics' [of a religion] or 'spirit' [of an economic system]). Besides, his programme of research was explicitly framed by a structuralistic perspective. Such a project, well in tune with the practice of social anthropology at the time, could not but lead to a form of essentialism.
12. See for instance the critique by F.G.Bailey of Dumont and Pocock's text: Bailey tackles indirectly with the question of 'territory' exclusively through a discussion of the 'sociological reality of the village' (he significantly substitutes 'village' for 'territory', the term used by Dumont and Pocock in the text he is discussing – Bailey 1959: 95). According to him, Dumont and Pocock deny such a reality because they discard the economic and political dimensions of the village.
13. The same preoccupations inform later studies of some of his former students, who have particularly worked out the ritual and symbolic dimensions of temple-centred territories (Galey 1985, 1986; Reiniche 1979, 1989, 1990).
14. See for instance Sax (1990: 493): 'Americans tend to think of their places of residence –houses, towns, states, or nations- as geographically bounded entities with definite borders. Residence is understood in the external terms of geographical location and/ or legal definition, and places and persons are rarely considered parts of each other. Many South Asians, by contrast, think of their places of residence as biophysical entities'. There, 'biophysical entities' are opposed not only to Americans' supposed disregard for interactions between places and persons, but also, at least implicitly, to their notion of bounded entities with definite borders.
15. The importance of the interaction between ecology and human (or other species') physiology has been well brought to light in Zimmermann's study of Ayurvedic texts (Zimmermann 1982).
16. For a different line of enquiry on this question, making use of an explicitly culturalist definition of territory and concerning itself with territorial segregation in terms of religious / caste / race identities, see the comparative volume edited by Gervais-Lambony, Landy and Oldfield (2005).
17. This intellectual construction seemed to fit with observations made about some classical texts. For instance, C.Malamoud (1990, 1996 [1976]) showed that territory in Vedic times seemed to be less determining than human bonds: 'the term grāma, generally translated as "village", more often designates a concentration of people or a network of institutions than it does a set territory... the stability of the grāma depends more upon the cohesion of its constitutive group than it does upon the space that it occupies' (Malamoud 1996 [1976]: 75).
18. Moreover, territory has been a widely studied topic in anthropological studies on nearby Nepal (sometimes said to present a sharp contrast with India on this question!). See Toffin (1984, 1987, 1993), Lecomte Tilouine (1993), Krauskopff (1989), Höfer (1971). See also the studies by P.Dollfus, A.de Sales, G.Krauskopff in Formoso (1996).
19. This should lead to a considerable revision of the idea forwarded by C. Bouglé, according to whom, in India, there existed no lex loci. For a critique, see Derrett (1968), Conrad (1995).

20. Moreover, it is necessary to distinguish between territorial gods, installed in shrines but often said to have come from 'outside', and the deities and various invisible powers of more or less dangerous character who inhabit places in the landscape -trees, waters, mountains. This opposition has sometimes been arbitrarily interpreted in terms of a contrast between 'Aryan gods' and so-called autochthonous 'Dravidian gods' (Shulman 1980: 134).

21. See also her recent book on the question, Brosius (2005).

REFERENCES

- Anderson, Benedict, 1983. Imagined Communities, London: Verso.
- Appadurai, Arjun, 1988. 'Introduction: Place and Voice in Anthropological Theory', Cultural Anthropology, 3-1: 16-20.
- Bailey, F.G., 1959. 'For a Sociology of India?', Contributions to Indian Sociology, 3: 88-101.
- Berti, Daniela, 2001. La parole des dieux. Rituels de possession dans l'Himalaya indien, Paris: CNRS Editions.
- Biardeau, Madeleine, 1982. 'Dharma et frontières politiques en Inde', in J.-P. Charnay et al., Le bonheur par l'empire ou le rêve d'Alexandre, Paris: Ed.Anthropos, pp. 29-35.
- Bonnemaison, J., and L. Cambrezy, 1995. 'Le lien territorial, entre frontières et identités', Géographie et Cultures, 20: 7-18.
- Bonnemaison, J., 1995. 'Les mots de la terre sacrée. L'exemple océanien', in La construction religieuse du territoire, ed. J.-F. Vincent, D.Dory and R.Verdier, Paris: L'Harmattan, pp. 66-73.
- Brosius, Christiane, 2005. Empowering Visions: The Politics of Representation in Hindu Nationalism. London: Anthem Press.
- Casey, Edward S., 1996. 'How to Get from Space to Place in a Fairly Short Stretch of Time. Phenomenological Prolegomena', in Senses of Place, ed. S. Feld & K.H. Basso, Santa Fe: School of American Research Press, pp. 13-52.
- Chakrabarti, Kunal, 2000. 'Cult Region: The Puranas and the Making of the Cultural Territory of Bengal', Studies in History, n.s., 16, 1: 1-16.
- Conrad, D., 1995. 'The Personal Law Question and Hindu Nationalism', in Representing Hinduism: The Construction of Religious Traditions and National Identity, ed. Vasudha Dhalma and H. von Stietencron, New Delhi: Sage, pp. 306-37.
- Daniel, E.Valentine, 1984. Fluid Signs: Being a Person the Tamil Way, University of California Press.
- Derrett, J.D.M., 1968. 'Custom and Law in Ancient India', in Religion, Law and the State in India, Delhi: Oxford University Press, pp. 148-70.
- Di Méo, Guy, 2000. Géographie sociale et territoires, Paris: Nathan.
- Dirks, Nicholas B., 1993. The Hollow Crown: Ethnohistory of an Indian Kingdom, Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Dory, D., 1995. 'Religions et territoires. Eléments de théorie et propositions de recherche', in La construction religieuse du territoire, ed. J.-F. Vincent, D.Dory and R.Verdier, Paris: L'Harmattan, pp. 367-75.
- Dumont, Louis, 1966. Homo Hierarchicus. Le système des castes et ses implications, Paris: Gallimard.

- Dumont, Louis, 1986 [1957]. A South Indian Subcaste: Social Organization and Religion of the Pramalai Kallar, Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Dumont, Louis, and Pocock, David, 1957. 'For a Sociology of India', Contributions to Indian Sociology, 1: 7-22.
- Dupont, Véronique, and Frédéric Landy, 2005. 'Segregation and Territory: What do We Mean? A Discussion in the Indian and South African Contexts', in Reconfiguring Identities and Building Territories in India and South Africa, ed. P. Gervais-Lambony, F. Landy and S. Oldfield, Delhi: Manohar / CSH, pp. 43-72..
- Eck, Diana 1981. 'India's Tirthas: "Crossings" in Sacred Geography', History of Religions, 20, 4: 323-44.
- Eck, Diana, 1998. 'The Imagined Landscape: Patterns in the Construction of Hindu Sacred Geography', Contributions to Indian Sociology, n.s., 32, 2: 165-88.
- Embree, Ainslie T., 1977. 'Frontiers into Boundaries: From the Traditional to the Modern State', in Realm and Region in Traditional India, ed. R.G. Fox, New Delhi: Vikas, pp. 255-80.
- Feld, S., and K.H. Basso, eds., 1996a. Senses of Place, Santa Fe: School of American Research Press.
- Feld, S., and K.H. Basso, 1996b. 'Introduction', in Senses of Place, ed. S. Feld & K.H. Basso, Santa Fe: School of American Research Press, pp. 3-11.
- Formoso, Bernard, ed., 1996. 'Dieux du sol en Asie', Etudes Rurales, 143-144.
- Foucault, Michel, 1986. 'Of Other Spaces' [transl. Jay Miskowiec], Diacritics, 16-1: 22-7.
- Fox, Richard G., 1971. Kin, Raja, and Rule: State-Hinterland Relations in Preindustrial India, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Galey, Jean-Claude, ed., 1985. L'Espace du temple –I. Espaces, itinéraires, médiations, Paris: EHESS.
- Galey, Jean-Claude, ed., 1986. L'Espace du temple –II. Les sanctuaires dans le royaume, Paris: EHESS.
- Galey, Jean-Claude, 1973. 'L'Etat et le lignage. Questions à propos d'un livre', L'Homme, XIII, 1-2: 71-82.
- Galey, Jean-Claude, 1989. 'Reconsidering Kingship in India: An Ethnological Perspective', History and Anthropology, 4: 123-87.
- Geertz, Clifford, 1996. 'Afterword', in Senses of Place, ed. S. Feld & K.H. Basso, Santa Fe: School of American Research Press, pp. 259-62.
- Géographie et Cultures*, n°20, 1996 [special number on the seminar Territoire, lien ou frontière: identités, conflits ethniques, enjeux et recompositions territoriales, Paris 1995].
- Gervais-Lambony, Philippe, Frédéric Landy and Sophie Oldfield, 2005. Reconfiguring Identities and Building Territories in India and South Africa, Delhi: Manohar / CSH.
- Godelier, Maurice, 1978. 'L'Appropriation de la nature. Territoire et propriété dans quelques formes de sociétés précapitalistes', La Pensée, 198: 7-50.
- Goswami, Manu, 1998. 'From Swadeshi to Swaraj: Nation, Economy, Territory in Colonial South Asia, 1870 to 1907', Comparative Studies in Society and History, 40-4: 609-36.
- Goswami, Manu, 2004. Producing India: From Colonial Economy to National Space, Chicago: Chicago University Press.

- Guillaud, D., 1996. 'Les formes du territoire. Trois modèles d'organisation territoriale: Aribinda (Burkina-Faso), Jambi (Indonésie) et Koumac (Nouvelle-Calédonie)', Géographie et Cultures, 20: 19-30.
- Gupta, Akhil, and James Ferguson, 1997. 'Culture, Power, Place : Ethnography at the End of an Era', in Culture, Power, Place. Explorations in Critical Anthropology, ed. A. Gupta and J. Ferguson, Duke University Press, pp. 1-29.
- Hirsch, Eric, and Michael O'Hanlon, eds., 1995. The Anthropology of Landscape: Perspectives on Place and Space, Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Höfer, A., 1971. 'Notes sur le culte du terroir chez les Tamang du Népal', in Langues et techniques, nature et société. T.2: Approche ethnologique, approche naturaliste, ed. J.M.C. Thomas and L. Bernod, Paris : Klincksieck, pp. 147-56.
- Jaffrelot, Christophe, 1996. 'La question du territoire en Inde : de l'universalisme aux particularismes ?', Cultures et Conflits, 21-22 : 75-102.
- Jamous, Raymond, 2003 [1991]. Kinship and Rituals among the Meo of Northern India: Locating Sibling Relationship (transl. by Nora Scott), New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Krauskopff, Gisèle, 1989. Maîtres et possédés. Les rites et l'ordre social chez les Tharu (Népal), Paris: CNRS.
- Lambert, Helen, 1996. 'Caste, Gender and Locality in Rural Rajasthan', in Caste Today, ed. C.J. Fuller, Delhi: Oxford University Press, pp. 93-123.
- Lecomte-Tilouine, Marie, 1993. Les dieux du pouvoir. Les Magar et l'hindouisme au Népal central, Paris: CNRS.
- Lévy, J., 1991. 'A-t-on encore (vraiment) besoin du territoire?', Espaces-Temps, 51-52: 102-42.
- Libersky-Bagnoud, Danouta, 2002. Les dieux du territoire. Penser autrement la généalogie, Paris, CNRS Editions / FMSH.
- Lingat, Robert, 1967. Les sources du droit dans le système traditionnel de l'Inde, Paris: Mouton/EHESS.
- Lovell, N., ed., 1998a. Locality and Belonging, London/New York: Routledge.
- Lovell, N., 1998b. 'Introduction', in Locality and Belonging, ed. N.Lovell, London/New York: Routledge, pp. 1-24.
- Malamoud, Charles, 1990. 'Sans lieu ni date. Note sur l'absence de fondation dans l'Inde védique', in Tracés de fondation, ed. M.Détienne, Paris/ Louvain: Peeters, pp. 183-91.
- Malamoud, Charles, 1996 [1976]. 'Village and Forest in the Ideology of Brahmanic India', in Cooking the World. Ritual and Thought in Ancient India (translation by David White), Delhi: Oxford University Press, pp. 74-91.
- Marriott, Mc Kim, and Ronald Inden, 1974. 'Caste Systems', Encyclopaedia Britannica, 3 : 982-91.
- Marriott, Mc Kim, ed., 1990. India through Hindu Categories, New Delhi: Sage.
- Mayer, Adrian C., 1960. Caste and Kinship in Central India: A Village and its Region, London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.
- Miller, Eric J., 1954. 'Caste and Territory in Malabar', American Anthropologist, LVI, 3 : 410-20.

- Mines, Mattison, 1984. The Warriors Merchants: Textiles, Trade, and Territory in South India, Cambridge University Press.
- Moffatt, Michael, 1990. 'Deconstructing McKim Marriott's Ethnosociology: an Outcaste's Critique', Contributions to Indian Sociology, n.s., 24, 2: 215-36.
- Parkhill, T., 1993. 'What's Taking Place: Neighborhood Ramlilas in Banaras', in Living Banaras. Hindu Religion in Cultural Context, ed. B.R. Hertel and C.A. Humes, Delhi: Manohar, pp. 103-26.
- Racine, Jean-Luc, ed., 1994. Les attaches de l'homme. Enracinement paysan et logiques migratoires en Inde du Sud, Paris: FMSH.
- Reiniche, Marie-Louise, 1979. Les dieux et les hommes. Etude des cultes d'un village du Tirunelveli, Inde du Sud, Paris/ La Haye : Mouton/ EHESS.
- Reiniche, Marie-Louise, 1989. Tiruvannamalai. Un lieu saint sivaïte du sud de l'Inde -4: la configuration sociologique du temple hindou, Paris: EFEO.
- Reiniche, Marie-Louise, 1990. 'Redécouvrir un dieu – fonder un « royaume » (sud de l'Inde)', in Tracés de fondation, ed. M.Détienne, Paris/ Louvain: Peeters, pp. 193-207.
- Rodman, Margaret C., 1992. 'Empowering Place: Multilocality and Multivocality', American Anthropologist, n.s., 94-3: 640-56.
- Sack, Robert D., 1983. 'Human Territoriality: A Theory', Annals of the Association of American Geographers, 73-1: 55-74.
- Sax, William, 1990. 'Village Daughter, Village Goddess: Residence, Gender, and Politics in a Himalayan Pilgrimage', American Ethnologist, 17-3: 491-512.
- Sax, William, 1991. Mountain Goddess: Gender and Politics in a Himalayan Pilgrimage, New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sax, William, 2000. 'Residence and Ritual in the Garhwal Himalayas', in Himalaya: Past and Present, vol.IV, ed. M.P. Joshi, A.C. Fanger and C.W. Brown, Almora: Shree Almora Book Depot, pp. 79-114.
- Shulman, David, 1980. Tamil Temple Myths: Sacrifice and Divine Marriage in the South Indian Śaiva Tradition, Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Srinivas, M.N., ed., 1960. India's Villages, Bombay: Media Promoters (2nd revised ed.)
- Stern, Henri, 1973. 'Le pouvoir dans l'Inde traditionnelle. Territoire, caste et parenté. Approche théorique et étude régionale (Rajasthan)', L'Homme, XIII, 1-2: 50-70.
- Tarabout, Gilles, 1991. 'Au « royaume » des brahmanes, les guerriers sont rois: souveraineté, pouvoir et statut au Kérala', in De la royauté à l'Etat. Anthropologie et histoire du politique dans le monde indien, ed. J.Pouchepadass and H.Stern, Paris: EHESS, pp. 75-122.
- Tarabout, Gilles, 1999. 'Corps possédés et signatures territoriales au Kérala', in La possession en Asie du Sud. Parole, corps, territoire, ed. J. Assayag and G. Tarabout, Paris : EHESS, pp. 313-55.
- Thapar, Romila, 1989. 'Epic and History: Tradition, Dissent and Politics in India', Past and Present, 125: 3-26.
- Toffin, Gérard, 1984. Société et religion chez les Néwar du Népal, Paris: CNRS.
- Toffin, Gérard, 1993. Le Palais et le Temple. La fonction royale dans la vallée du Népal, Paris: CNRS.
- Toffin, Gérard, ed., 1987. 'Paysages et divinités en Himalaya', Etudes Rurales, 107-8.

- Uchiyamada, Yasuchi, 1995. Sacred Grove (kāvu): Ancestral Land of 'Landless Agricultural Labourers' in Kerala, India', London: LSE (unpublished PhD dissertation).
- Vincent, J.-F., D.Dory and R.Verdier, eds., 1995. La construction religieuse du territoire, Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Wink, André, 1986. Land and Sovereignty in India: Agrarian Society and Politics under the Eighteenth-Century Maratha Svarajya, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Zimmermann, Francis, 1982. La Jungle et le Fumet des viandes. Un thème écologique dans la médecine hindoue, Paris: Gallimard.